I believe that the entertainment industry does need the ability to protect their content. I also believe that it would be a mistake to make any ruling that would limit the ability of the electronics and communications industry from innovating in the area of digital signal processing. As a country, we should never allow the monetary interest of any group or individual to override the right of the public or any other group to innovate. Every step taken down that path takes us closer to a day when we will have nothing new to look forward to. Closer to a world where the only thing we can see or hear is what someone wants you to see or hear. The fact that the entertainment industry has digital media available to distribute content on is because of innovation. Imagine what the aviation industry would be like if the airlines had the power to dictate what airplanes were built. I bet we would have never gone to the moon.
